Grammars of Creation is a broad examination of beginnings and ends, of past and possible future, and especially of art, the consummate human achievement. Steiner acknowledges that "there have been previous senses of ending and fascination with sundown in Western culture", but he believes we have reached a much more far-reaching one now: "a core-tiredness."

George Steiner – Wikipedia

If Grammars of Creation is typical of his passionate eloquence and immense level of erudition and culture, I have some thrills ahead. In Grammars, Steiner ranges discursively across philosophy, literature, painting, mathematics and science and looks at what comes before, during and after the act of creation, invention or discovery. His intellectual curiosity is brilliantly on display; page after page offers sensitive and illuminating readings.
